A glasce at the detailed figures shows what happened better than words can tell. It was split-ticket voting by Democrats that did it. The city and county government is practically entirelied by the Hemocrata, but the legislature remains Republican.

I have refrained from expressing opinions or discussing the political cituation publicly during the campaign, and the same reasons would seem to suggest that I do not comment specifically on the situation at present. I can say, however, that I am not one of those Republicans who think that Democratic victory means ruin to the counties. "In regard to the local situation, there is a great deal that might be said, but which as already intimated. It might not be in the best taste for me to say at the present time. SAN FRANCISCO, November 6.—
The first returns from over the United States, within two hours of the closing of the polls, indicated the election of Wilson and Marshall by an overwhelming vote. For the first time in its history Massachusetts reported that a Democratic candidate for President had swept the States with an estimated majority of 60,000.

With the old Bay State leading the way, New York followed with an estimate of 150,000 majority for Wilson. Francisco save Wilson. Now less and Texas would not have been alarming had it not been for the voter in Massachusetts. Parther indications that the Democratic candidate had riven the rock-fibbed Republican. New England states, came with the announcement that he had carried Maine and Connecticut.

"Walt until you hear from Pennsyivania and Washington," said the Bull Moosers, but the first named State reported that Wilson has a big lead and the Wolverines of Michigan wired that the indications were that Wilson had carried that State, although the returns were coming in slowly.

With these returns, the East and South were conceded to Wilson, and at half-past ten O'clock, President for the last few days ago, and as X-ray and the Wolverines of Michigan wired that the indications were that Wilson had carried that State, although the returns were coming in slowly.
